IBM, NASSCOM makes over 2,500 students employment ready

Software giant IBM and NASSCOM Foundation have jointly announced the culmination of the first year of the New-collar Employability Skills Program under this more than 2,500 students from 23 colleges across the regions of Karnataka, NCR and Haryana completed this certified course on emerging technologies of data science and cloud computing.

"The skills development collaboration with education institutions and our program partners, the response we received from new age employers - with over 750 students receiving new collar employment offers - more than 60 per cent of these students being girls - are all indicating that the ecosystem is gearing up for the skills and the jobs of the future,"

Manoj Balachandran, Leader, Corporate Social Responsibility, IBM India Pvt. Ltd.

This corporate social responsibility intervention by IBM engaged students through an on-campus approach in a 204 hour-long blended training model that uses online and face-to-face training immersions to build skills in new-age technologies like Data Science and Cloud Computing.

"We are delighted to see this new and unique initiative succeed and are happy to share that we will be continuing this partnership for the second year and make 2500 more students from non-tech institutes employable," Ashok Pamidi, CEO, NASSCOM Foundation, added.

IIMs, IITs form consortium

Indian Institute of Management (IIMs) and Indian Institute of Technology (IITs) have formed a consortium to promote entrepreneurship ecosystem through research and tion-Venturing and Entrepreneurship in India Network (iVEIN) to leverage their strengths and work with incubators, investors and the government for disseminating knowledge," studies professor Thillai Rajan said the three areas would play a key role in the country's economic growth.

"The iVEIN network will facilitate research in the field among the aca-between stakeholders, strengthen the ecosystem and synthesise the knowledge that is in silos among different groups.

"As academic incubators play a critical role, iVEIN will help create a platform for them to share best practices and take lead in promoting activities like research that are neglected by the private ecosystem," said IIM-Bangalore professor Venkatesh Panchapagesan on the occasion.

The network will also document Indian experiences in entrepreneurship and innovation and create a data-based knowledge for all stakeholders.

"The initiative will give a fillip to entrepreneurship in the country by aiding policy formulation, implementing innovation and helping managerial practice," said the statement.

collaboration around innovation, the business school said.

"IIMs in Bengaluru, Kolkata and Kozhikode and IITs in Bombay and Madras have formed the Innova-the institute said in a statement.

Noting that innovation, venturing and entrepreneurship were getting attention from policymakers, IIT-Madras management demic fraternity and create avenues for disseminating knowledge through conferences and journal publications," said Rajan.

The network will also create a strategic bridge

Bad diet can affect sperm count

Men, beware! What you eat is directly linked to your reproductive health. A recent study has found that a bad (read: everything junk and unhealthy) diet can affect your sperm quality and count, and even bring it down. Conducted by US researchers, the study found that young men who ate junk food on the regu-

the journal JAMA Network Open, the study found that those men who ate a lot of pizza, burgers, fries and sugary foods, had a 25pc lower sperm count than those who ate veggies, fish and fruits. In fact, their sperm count was said to be around 167 million to the 122 million count of unhealthy eaters.

In other words, be-lar had a significantly-less sperm count than those who ate healthy food.

For the study, the sperm quality of some 3,000 Danish men was analysed, keeping in mind their eating habits. Published in tween 2017 and 2019, the semen samples were studied by researchers, who came to the understanding that the median total sperm count was 140 million per ml, well within the normal range set by the World Health Organisation (WHO) — that of 40 million to 300 million. The respondents were divided into four food groups: western pattern, prudent pattern (healthiest), open-sandwich pattern and vegetarian-like pattern (low in meat). As mentioned before, while the healthiest eaters had a count of 167 million, they were followed by those who ate mainly vegetarian, with 151 million.

The study reaffirms the fact that food is directly linked to the reproductive health of men. In fact, numerous other studies have shown that the quality of semen has deteriorated in many western countries in the last few decades.

Men who consumed recreational drugs, smoked, had a high BMI, or used muscle-enhancing supplements, were not included in the study.

Eating fast food can make kids fat

If you want your children to stay in shape, do not allow them to indulge in burgers and pizzas. Researchers have found that fast food intake can independently contribute to excess weight gain among children.

Being overweight and obese increases the risk of numerous physical and psychosocial problems during childhood, including fatty liver disease, Type-2 diabetes and depression.

"We now know from our studies and others, that kids who start on the path of extra weight gain during this really important time ward into adolescence and adulthood, and this sets them up for major health consequences as they get older," said first author Jennifer Emond, Assistant Professor at the Geisel School of Medicine at Dartmouth College, US.

"To our knowledge, ours is the first study to follow a cohort over time and to show that fast food, by itself, uniquely contributes to weight gain," explained Emond.

Previous research has shown that fast food intake is common among children and has suggested that there is an association between contributes to excess weight gain at such a young age.

In an effort to make this determination, the investigators followed a cohort of more than 500 pre-school age children (ages 3 to 5) and their families in southern New Hampshire for one year.

The height and weight of the children were mea-fast food consumption and children becoming overweight or obese. But it has not been clear whether eating fast food independently sured at the beginning and end of the study published in the journal Pediatric Obesity. Parents reported their children's fast food intake frequency weekly - from 11 chain fast food restaurants - in six online surveys that were completed at two-month intervals.

The researchers found that at the beginning of the study, about 18 per cent of the children were overweight and nearly 10 per cent were obese.

Importantly, about 8 per cent of the children transitioned to a greater weight status over the one-year period.

"Unlike with past research, we were able to adjust for other factors - such as exercise and screen time - that could possibly explain away this relationship," Emond said.

search should be used to inform guidelines and policies that can reduce fast food marketing exposure to children and help support parents who may be struggling to adopt healthier eating behaviours for their kids," she added.

Deworming among adults: A necessary process

In the present-day world where hectic lifestyle predominates, food habits have seen a major shift, and consuming outside food has become an obvious choice due to constraint of time. This has led to health concerns. One such largely increasing and less focussed issue is of worms in the digestive system and more so, about the lack of knowledge around deworming. It refers to the process of getting rid of worms that enter the human body.

Worm infestation is a common issue that is seen mostly among children, but due to the change in lifestyle patterns this infestation is also seen among the adults. In most cases, worm infestation is not a life-threatening infection but it can lead to various clinical problems. In India, worm infestation is one of the reasons which is causing increase in infant morbidity. This is mostly caused due to the unhygienic lifestyle that one leads and one of the common modes are through the consumption of uncooked

Tapeworm, roundworm and hookworms are the major types of worms that infest in the walls of the stomach. The worms which usually gets into the stomach through food, starts taking the nutrition from our bodies and it may migrate to lungs, brain, eyes etc. Some of the major signs and symptoms that can be observed in case of worm infestation include fever, abdominal pain, itching at the rectal area, loss of weight and appetite, tiredness, anaemia along with loose stools and vomiting. In adults, this may lead to deterioration of adult productivity, hamper nutritional levels, cause cough, seizures depending on the site where the worm gets lodged.

While deworming among children has gained attention worldwide but deworming among adults remains an unnoticed issue. Studies, however, show that deworming should be carried out among adults too, periodically.

These worm infections are observed to be more common where people are surrounded by poor sewage disposal, inadequate water treatment and poor food sanitation.

Some of the ways in which humans can get parasitic worms include:

- Lick from one's pet
- Walking barefoot
- Swimming in a pool with untreated water.
- Not washing hands before and after meals or before preparing food
- Under-cooked meat
- Accidental swallowing/ ingestion of eggs, larvae, cysts or adult worms

living in food, drink, soil and faeces

Personal hygiene and household cleanliness is of utmost importance to prevent infestation. Some steps that can be followed as a daily practice are:

- Washing vegetables (especially green leafy vegetables) and fruits before consumption
- Cut and scrub your nails regularly
- Ensure that the toilets, bedroom and laundry area are disinfected every day.
- Thoroughly wash clothes, towels and bed

linen

• Washing the hands regularly especially after using the washroom as well as before and after the meals must be a habit.

A single dosage of Albendazole 400 mg eliminates the worm existing in the intestine but specific treatment needs to be done for different worms and symptoms secondary to it. A simple stool test confirms the worm infestation in most cases. The author is consultant-internal medicine, Columbia Asia Hospital, Hebbal
