What is intuitive eating?

Intuitive eating is not a diet plan. It is instead an eating habit or philosophy that monitors the body's need for food. It is about not opposing cravings, and having wholesome meals when the body demands. Ultimately, food is what keeps us going through the day by providing energy and keeping us active. But, with so many options out there (read: fried, oily food) it can get tricky to keep away those cravings and decide on what to eat and what not to.

Most of us live in 'diet mentality' which not only said diet, but also others who despite not following a diet, fear eating things that may be high on fat, sugar or carbs. Dieting or just avoiding certain food items, limiting certain food groups, and calorie counting without consulting an expert can not only affect one physically, but also mentally. That's when intuitive eating comes into the picture, as it promotes mindful eating by listening to the body's need, even when it comes to consuming junk food.

A book, Intuitive Eating: A Revolutionary Program That Works, written by prominent nutritionists Evelyn Tribole and Elyse Resch focuses on some of these points. It talks about nurturing your body rather than starving it, and encouraging natural weight loss. The philosophy of your body and its hunger signals, and doesn't impose guidelines about what to avoid and what or when to eat.

Here are some of the steps to inculcate intuitive eating:

- Reject diet mentality

- Listen to your body when it's hungry so that you can make better food choices.
- Make peace with food even if it is unhealthy food. As when you provide your body with what it demands, it slowly loses craze for it.
- Don't keep your body starved as it tends to demand more food than required. Eating when you are little hungry and stopping when moderately full can help you keep the body under control.
- Discover what is your eat. This helps to avoid overeating.
- Cope with your emotions with kindness.
- Respect your body and don't chase weight monitors just for the sake of it. Body image topics can destroy your mental peace.

Exposure to air pollution linked to risk of kidney diseases

Living in countries with higher levels of air pollution, such as India and China, may be associated with an increased risk of developing kidney diseases, a study suggests.

Researchers from the Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine in the US said the findings may be especially important for parts of the world with higher air pollution, like India and China, where fine particulate matter levels are 5 to 10 times higher than in the US.

It is known that breathing in air pollution can have detrimental health effects beyond the lungs, but few studies have shown how it impacts the kidneys, which act as filters for the blood, they said. The study, published in the Journal of the American Society of Nephrology (JASN), examined information on 10,997 adults across four sites in the monthly average levels of tiny particles of air pollution -- called fine particulate matter -- based on paring fossil fuel combustion, industrial processes, and natural sources.

They found that exposure to higher amounts of fine particulate matter was associated with a higher degree of albuminuria -- a marker of kidney dysfunction -- at the start of the study as well as a higher risk of developing chronic kidney disease over time.

"As rates of chronic kidney disease rise worldwide, it is important to understand whether and how exposure to air pollution plays a role," said Matthew C. Johnson from Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine.

Future studies should examine whether efforts to improve air quality yield health benefits, including reducing rates of chronic kidney disease, the researchers said.

Scientists create software to help develop coronavirus vaccine

Busting myths about novel coronavirus, World Health Organisation (WHO) had specified the need for a new vaccine for the infection, as existing vaccines cannot provide the required protection. And now, a team of researchers have created a software that is being deemed a "critical breakthrough" in the search for vaccine for the novel coronavirus.

According to the official website of the University of Toronto, researchers Ali Punjani's research called at Austin and US National Institutes of Health created the first 3D atomic scale map of the part of the virus that attaches to and infects human cells, known as spike protein. The findings have been based on a software spun out of University of Toronto researcher Ali Punjani's research called cryoSPARC to process the data related to coronavirus spike protein and obtain accurate 3D images of the spike in real time.

"We can actually look at a new disease that was discovered just a couple of months ago and see how it works at the molecular level. It's very exciting," Punjani was quoted as saying.

Jason McLellan, associate professor in molecular biosciences at UT Austin and co-author, said the software also facilitated data processing while travelling. In fact, it took only 12 days for the researchers to produce an atomic map from the raw sample.

"One of their novel algorithms, referred to as 3D Variability Analysis, provided insights into the dynamic motions of the coronavirus spike protein that are important for receptor-binding and membrane fusion," McLellan said in a statement.

According to researchers, cryoSPARC makes use of a technique called cryogenic electron microscopy or cryo-EM. This allows scientists to obtain high-resolution images of proteins by shooting electrons at frozen samples, followed by accurate 3D visualisation facilitated by cryoSPARC. And scientists believe their work will help in vaccine development.
