E-learning in Delhi varsities in times of coronavirus epidemic

NEW DELHI: Colleges and universities across the capital are going the extra mile to ensure that the learning process continues even as the institutes remain closed owing to the 2019 novel coronavirus threat.

From uploading e-lectures and digital reading material, to allowing video calls during class hours to clarify doubts, colleges and universities across Delhi are doing it all. Last week, the Delhi government had announced that schools, colleges, and universities in the capital should remain closed till March 31 as precautionary measure. Following the directive, universities — like Delhi University and Jamia Millia Islamia — suspended regular classes and issued guidelines on sharing e-resources with students to continue in the teaching-learning process.

Several colleges have fallen back on unique methods. For instance, Ramjas College, which had developed a dashboard last year connecting students and teachers, will be expanding its functionality.

Principal Manoj Khanna said, "Teachers were already using our dashboard to send assignments and upload e-lectures accessible by students of that subject. We are now modifying and have expanded the size so that more material can be uploaded to prepare e-modules. Students can also upload queries which can later be addressed by teachers."

Due to existing digital platforms like MHRD's SWAYAM and UGC's Consortium for Educational Communication, several teachers had already prepared e-learning material that could be disseminated among students.

"The e-resources which were already prepared have also been uploaded on platforms like YouTube. Since we had already covered three-fourths of the syllabus, that material is being used for revision by science students who have their practicals towards the end of April," said Hardeep Kaur, who teaches in the Zoology department at Ramjas.

Colleges like Miranda House are also working on a similar mechanism where teachers can share e-resources which can only be accessed by their students. "While classroom teaching will not take place, we will be having an academic committee meeting on Monday to discuss the modalities," said principal Bijayalaxmi Nanda.

Jamia Millia Islamia has also asked its teachers to carry out internal assessment online, in addition to sharing e-resources. The university library also offered "customised services" for "downloading research and teaching material required" to circulate among students.

Media coordinator Ahmad Azeem said, "Teachers, who were going to give lectures, will share those along with references and reading materials on groups. They will also be for discussions on Skype. Internal assessments will be taken in the form of assignments via email till March 31." Academic council members have also written to the vice chancellor asking him to consider "extending the duration of the semester" and "make corresponding changes in the examination schedule."

Meanwhile, teachers and students of Daulat Ram College remained in a fix after they received informal communication to conduct their mid-semester examinations from Monday. This comes despite the DU circular asking colleges to postpone all internal exams till March 31. Principal Savita Roy did not comment on the matter. Requesting anonymity, a teacher from the college said the message of holding exams online was relayed on WhatsApp. "Initially, it was announced that mid-sem exams would be cancelled. But on Saturday, we received communication that exams would be conducted as per schedule by different departments. Teachers and students are both concerned about this."

Startup GUVI begins free online courses

NEW DELHI: With schools and colleges being closed in many states in the wake of the coronavirus outbreak, edtech start-ups are trying their best to put online learning in the spotlight by providing courses free of cost. IIT Madras-incubated start-up GUVI is the latest to join the bandwagon, after edtech players such as Byju and Toppr. GUVI is offering online IT skilling courses free of cost to engineering students who have been impacted by the shutdown of colleges due to the pandemic, in a bid to help them prepare for campus placements.

The company's platform is open to all engineering students free of cost for a duration of two weeks. According to Arun Prakash, one of the founders of the start-up, over 6,000 students have registered to avail the services.

"The response of the students is very encouraging, and we in turn aim to offer them the best learning experience. Due to the sudden closure of colleges and training centres, students are facing a problem, and our courses will immensely benefit them now," said Prakash, adding that experts from the field have been roped in to provide the best knowledge experience.

Since the courses are free, GUVI expects the expenses to definitely burn a hole in its pocket. However, the start-up expects the initiative to help it in the long run. "We have seen digital payments beginning to trend in the country post demonetisation. Similarly, the present situation is likely to give a thrust to the edtech industry," Prakash explained. Along with the IT skilling courses, GUVI will also conduct webinars related to Data Science and Blockchain.

"We need to ensure the safety of students (from virus) through all possible measures, while also ensuring that they have the requisite skills for bright job prospects. GUVI is contributing in a small but significant manner towards these goals, to ensure that the students acquire the right skills and become employable," said SP Balamurugan, co-founder and chief executive officer of the company.

Online mentors are also available to support students on GUVI's online coding platform 'Code Kata'. The company's online platform also helps students learn in their mother tongues. In addition to these, more than 100 technologists from top product companies have volunteered to conduct 30-day free webinars on the top IT skills that the industry is looking for, which the students can learn from home on GUVI's platform free of charge.
